Overview

- CDM a “market” mechanism: genius and pitfalls
- Market values and international commodity trading
- Sustainable Development and capital structures : Ownership Matters
- A private/NGO model for turning the CDM tide
- Can community capacity building drive CDM?

CDM: Full of Promise!

- Revolutionary disruption of traditional economics
- Carbon as a commodity
- Puts environmental value into commercial marketplace

CDM: Is the Inequity Endemic?

- sustainable development components are sacrificed
- competition among host countries encourages lower standards of SD
- wealth flows to the developed nations
- market mechanisms reinforce traditional economic patterns
- using market value to determine development priorities (pushing a string?)

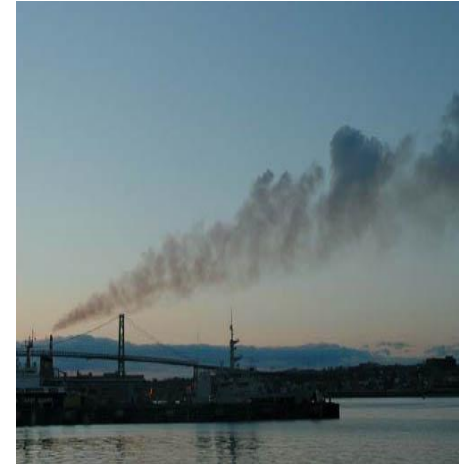

Even in SD: Ownership Matters

- Governance issues rooted in ownership
- Profit driven development can lead to detachment
- Market determined development blind to social and political needs
- Not necessarily value added for community (no engagement, not necessarily local jobs)

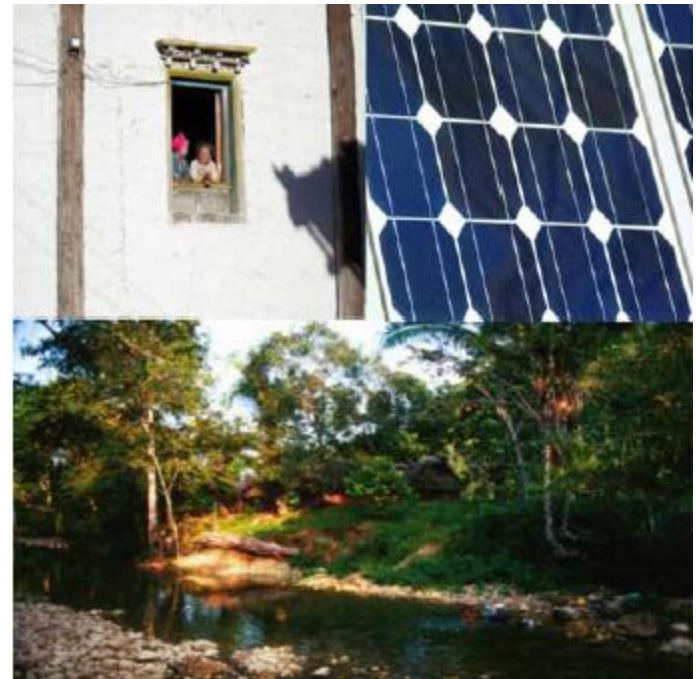

Even in SD: Ownership Matters

- Local investment decisions
- Local control of energy and other resources
- Siting decisions
- Empowerment/Professional Development
- Community economic development strengthened
- Community Capacity Building becomes embedded

Turning the Tide? A New Partnership Model

- The Clean Development Alliance: a private/NGO Partnership for development
- Empower and build capacity of proponents/communities to participate and manage energy and carbon resources
- Ensure that returns from CERs are directed to high impact sustainable development programming

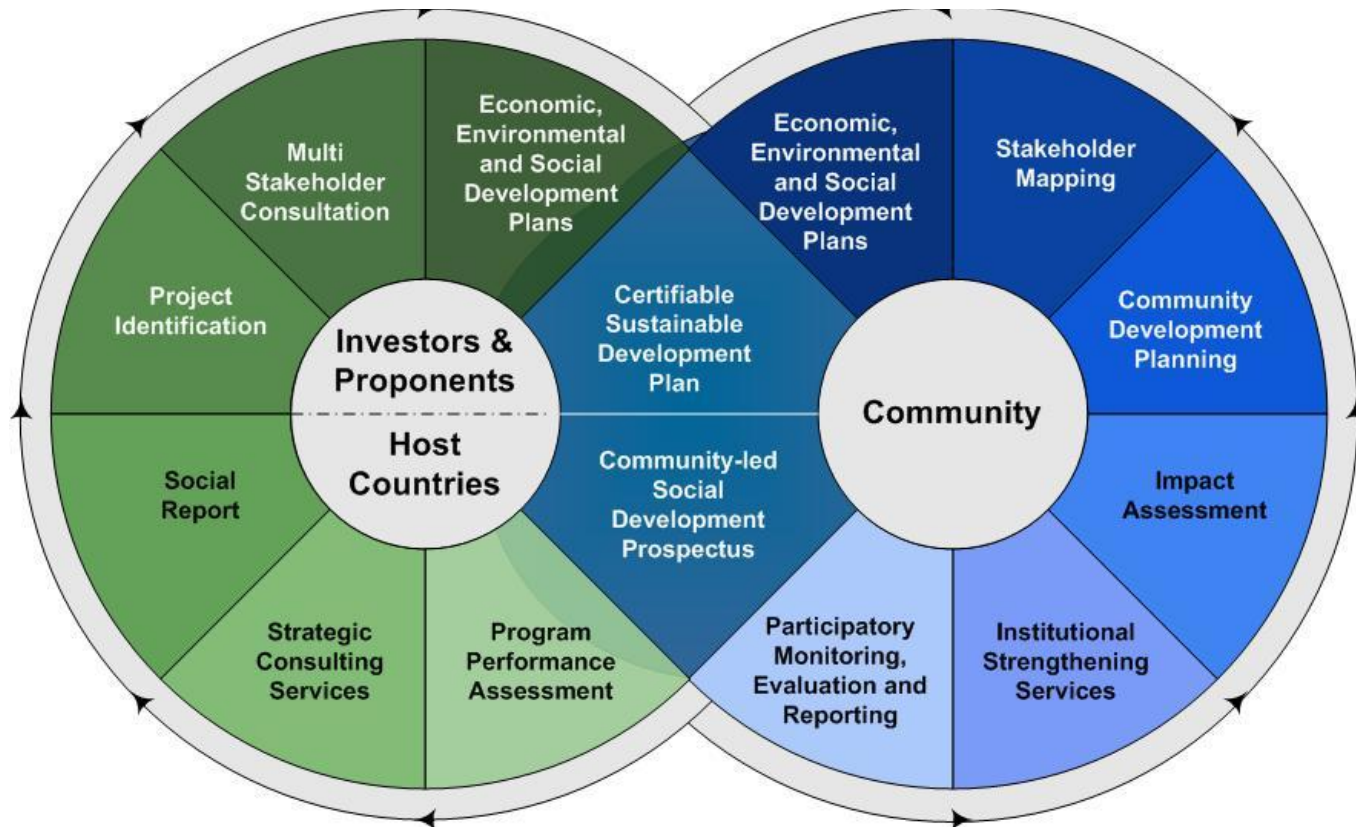

Partnership in Action: Strategies for Strengthening Capacity

- Technology transfer in renewable energy, energy efficiency, community participation and capacity building
- Community-based solutions for emissions reduction strategies
- Alliances with local organizations and development practitioners that support the development and implementation of CDM projects
